“Fernanda, are you awake?” Mama whispered.
“Hmph...” said Fernanda.
It was time for carnival. But Fernanda was not outside dancing with her friends in the dance troupe. She was cooped up in bed with an illness instead.

“How are you feeling? You look much better,” said Mama. “Would you like some hot soup for when you watch the carnival?”

“Dancing is in my soul, Mama. I would prefer to dance in the carnival, not watch it from here,” Fernanda said, pulling the curtains open.

“You are full of germs,” said Mama. “Besides, look what I bought today. It’s a paint set.”
“I’m a dancer, not a painter. I’m rubbish at painting.” Fernanda hunched her shoulders.
“That’s because you worry about painting in a perfect way,” said Mama.

“What should I paint, then?” Fernanda asked.
“Whatever you like. You could paint your fern,” said Mama.

“This is canvas. It’s something you can paint on,” said Mama. She found lots of paintbrushes and got Fernanda a pot of water. Just then, somebody shouted from outside.

Fernanda rushed to the window. Her friends Ana, Lucas and Lou were outside.

“Fernanda! Fernanda!” called Lou. “Look at my wonderful costume!” Lou twirled round and round.

“Are you better?” Ana asked. “Please come to the carnival.”

Just then, a troupe of dancers came past.

“We have to go. We miss you, Fernanda,” said Lucas. “See you later!”

The carnival began. Fernanda heard the trumpets tooting and drums booming. People who were not dancing enjoyed the music from the kerb. Fernanda wanted to dance in the troupe with her friends.

“Why don’t you give painting a go?” Mama said, handing Fernanda a paintbrush. “Make a start on that fern.”

Fernanda took a closer look at the fern.
She could see shades of dark green and bits of light green on the leaves. She moved the fern into the light and could see shiny bits of yellow.

With a swish here and a flick there, Fernanda began to paint the fern.

“What do you think, Mama?” said Fernanda, holding the finished fern painting.
“That is fantastic, Fernanda!” said Mama.

“I’m going to put it up in the kitchen,”
said Mama.

“It’s not perfect...” Fernanda said.

“It does not have to be,” Mama smiled.

Fernanda was ready to paint again the next morning.

“I want to paint something different today. I could paint a person,” said Fernanda.

“If you feel up to it,” said Mama. “You could paint the carnival.”

“That is a super idea, Mama!” said Fernanda, jumping up from the table.

Fernanda gave it her best shot. She perched on a stool and tried to paint the feathery headdresses and glittery costumes. It was not going well.

She could not focus. The dancers were twirling, spinning and moving around so fast that it was too difficult to paint them.

“How is your painting of the carnival?” Mama asked.

“It’s terrible! It would be a lot easier if the dancers were standing still,” said Fernanda.

“I give up.”

Knock! Knock! Knock!

"Someone is here," said Mama, rushing to answer it.

"Can they help with my painting?" Fernanda moaned.

Fernanda's friends had come to see her.
"We brought you some soup to get better,"
said Lou.
"And some burgers from the carnival to perk
you up," said Lucas.

“The troupe missed having its best dancer,”
said Ana. “We hope you weren’t too bored.”
“Thank you for visiting me!” said Fernanda.
“I have been painting.”

“I’ve got an idea... You three can pose for me!” said Fernanda. “The carnival outside moves too fast. If you stand still, I can paint your costumes and get it right.”

The three friends were happy to pose for Fernanda's painting. They stood very still while Fernanda carried on with her painting.

"That looks perfect!" said Lou.

"I could add more paint to the shoulders..."
said Fernanda.

"No, I think it's great the way it is," said Ana.

“Look at you! Our little painter,” said Lucas.
“Next year you could paint the carnival
instead of dancing in it!”
“I think I will do both!” said Fernanda.
